Afternoon Tea

The taking of afternoon tea began in Victorian times around the turn of the 19th century. Allegedly it was invented by Ann Duchess of Bedford to relieve the hunger she encountered between lunch and dinner. One day she complained of experiencing a "sinking feeling" and instructed her servants to bring her tea and cakes. She found it so delightful that it became a regular occurrence in her daily routine and she enjoyed it every afternoon thereafter. The taking of afternoon tea quickly became an established practice among the Victorian upper classes, but after only a few decades it became so popular that tea rooms began to open for the general public.
